Progress in the States for Equal Pay

It has been 60 years since the Equal Pay Act was passed, and since then, women have made tremendous strides in the labor force. However, women continue to be paid less than their male counterparts in every single state. The wage gap hits women of color the hardest—compared to what white, non-Hispanic men working full time, year-round make, the lifetime wage gap would amount to more than $1 million for Asian women in two states, for Black women in 19 states, for Latinas in 31 states, for Native women in 20 states, and for Native Hawaiian or other Pacific Islander women in 6 states.<sup>1</sup>

A robust movement to close gender wage gaps has been sweeping across the country, including an increasing focus on requiring employers to be transparent about pay. In the past few years, lawmakers have introduced equal pay legislation in over two-thirds of states and many of these bills have become law.<sup>2</sup> State efforts to close the wage gap not only make meaningful changes for women's and families' economic security, but they also lift states' economies. Unfortunately, in 2022, we also saw one of the first state bills actively attacking equal pay pass in Mississippi, and advocates should be on the lookout for similar harmful efforts in their state.

This fact sheet highlights states that passed equal pay legislation in 2019, 2020, 2021, 2022, and 2023.

BEWARE: AN UNEQUAL "EQUAL PAY" BILL

In April 2022, Mississippi passed a so-called "equal pay" bill<sup>3</sup> that risks exacerbating gender wage gaps in the state.<sup>3</sup> The bill, in effect as of July 2022, rubber stamps employers' decisions to pay women less than men for equal work and threatens to take away Mississippians more robust equal pay rights under federal law. Among many problematic provisions,<sup>4</sup> this legislation:

- Expressly allows employers to pay a woman less than a man for equal work based on her salary history, even though states are increasingly banning this practice<sup>5</sup> because data shows relying on salary history forces women to carry pay discrimination from job to job.
- Expressly allows employers to pay a woman less than a man for equal work because of any gap in her job history, making it acceptable to pay a woman less than a man doing the same job because, for example, she took time to have a baby or care for a sick family member.
- Forces employees who seek to enforce the state "equal pay" law to waive their protections under the federal Equal Pay Act, leaving them with fewer rights than they currently have, because the protections in the new state law are weaker than under the federal Equal Pay Act.

Pay Range Transparency Progress in the States

None Introduced since 2021 Enacted

Requiring Transparency Around Pay Ranges

When employers aren't transparent about pay, gender and racial wage gaps widen and women and people of color lose out. Studies show that when job applicants are clearly informed about the context for negotiations, including the types of compensation, benefits, conditions that are negotiable, or the typical pay for the position, the gender wage gap narrows. Disclosing the pay or pay range for a position helps keep employers accountable, levels the negotiating playing field, and gives applicants and employees new tools to detect and remedy any unjustified pay disparities. Ten states have passed or amended pay range transparency laws since 2018—nine in just the last three years—and more and more states are considering passing their own.

- COLORADO: Colorado amended its pay range transparency law to clarify that employers must disclose in good faith the pay range and a general description of benefits and other compensation for the job opportunity.<sup>6</sup> The amendment also requires the job posting to include the date the application window is anticipated to close.

In addition, within 30 days after a successful candidate begins working, the employer must share information about the successful candidate with at least the employees with whom the candidate would be regularly working, including the candidate's name, former job title if the candidate was already working for the employer, the new job title, and information on how employees may demonstrate an interest in similar job opportunities in the future.

The bill also amended the requirement that employers broadly share "all opportunities for promotion" with all employees on the same day and before making a decision to instead require employers to share only "job opportunities," which excludes "career development" promotions involving changes to an employee's terms of compensation, full-time/part-time status, duties or changes in title or compensation based on past performance or "career progression" promotions involving movement from one position to another based on time or other objective metrics. Employers physically located exclusively outside of Colorado with fewer than 15 employees working remotely in Colorado are only required to provide their Colorado employees notice of remote job opportunities through July 1, 2029.

For positions with career progressions, an employer must disclose and make available to all eligible employees the requirements for career progression, along with compensation, benefits, duties, whether the position is full-time or part-time, and access to further advancement. The bill is currently awaiting the Governor's signature.

- HAWAII: Hawaii passed a pay range transparency bill that requires employers with 50 or more employees to include an hourly rate or a salary range in job listings.<sup>7</sup> The employer must share a range that reasonably reflects the expected compensation.
- ILLINOIS: Illinois amended its equal pay law to require employers with 15 or more employees to include a pay range and a general description of benefits and other compensation in their job listings.<sup>8</sup> If an employer does not post a position, the bill requires employers to disclose the pay range and a general description of benefits and other compensation to an applicant before discussing pay and at the applicant's request. The bill also requires employers to share opportunities for promotion to all current employees within 14 days of the employer making an external posting of the position.

- CALIFORNIA: California passed a law that requires employers with 15 or more employees to include the pay scale for a position in any job posting.<sup>9</sup> If the employer is advertising the job through a third party, then the employer must provide the pay scale to the third party, who must then include it in the job posting. The new law also requires employers to provide the pay scale for the position the employee currently holds, upon request. Under a 2017 law, employers of all sizes were already required to provide applicants with the pay scale for a position when they request it.<sup>10</sup> The law is currently awaiting the Governor's signature.
- NEW YORK: New York passed a law that requires employers with four or more employees and employment agencies to disclose the compensation or a range of compensation and job description, when advertising a job, promotion, or transfer opportunity that will "physically be performed, at least in part, in the state of New York, including a job, promotion, or transfer opportunity that will physically be performed outside of New York but reports to a supervisor, office, or other work site in New York."<sup>11</sup> Employers may not refuse to interview, hire, promote, employ or otherwise retaliate against an applicant or current employee for exercising any rights under the law.

- WASHINGTON: Washington amended its previous salary range transparency law to require that employers with 15 or more employees disclose in job postings the wage scale or salary range for a position, and a general description of the benefits and other compensation to be offered.<sup>12</sup> The law defines job posting as any solicitation intended to recruit applicants for a specific available position, including recruitment done through a third party, and postings done electronically or with a printed hard copy.

- CONNECTICUT: Connecticut amended its equal pay law to require employers to disclose the wage range for positions to both job applicants and current employees.<sup>13</sup> Employers must provide a job applicant with the wage range if the applicant requests it or when the employer offers the applicant the position, whichever occurs first. Employers must provide an employee the wage range when the employee is hired, changes positions, or requests a wage range. The law defines "wage range" as the range an employer "anticipates relying on" for the position and may include pay scale, previously determined wages for the position, actual wages for comparable employees, or the budgeted amount for the position.
- NEVADA: Nevada enacted legislation requiring employers to provide an applicant with the wage range for a position if the applicant has completed an interview.<sup>14</sup> Employers must provide an employee the wage range for a promotion or transfer if the employee has applied for a promotion or transfer, completed an interview, and requested the wage range.
- RHODE ISLAND: Rhode Island amended its equal pay law to require employers to provide the wage range to an applicant when the applicant requests it, as well as prior to discussing compensation.<sup>15</sup> Employers must provide an employee the wage range when the employee is hired, changes positions, or requests the wage range.

- MARYLAND: Maryland amended its equal pay law to require employers to provide the salary range for a position if the applicant for that position requests it.<sup>16</sup> The law also prohibits employers from retaliating against applicants for requesting the salary range for a position.

Requiring Employers to Collect and Report Pay Data

You can't fix what you can't measure. This is especially true for pay discrimination, which is often difficult to detect and address, because a culture of secrecy surrounding pay leaves many of those experiencing pay discrimination unaware they are being shortchanged. It would be much easier to close discriminatory wage gaps if agencies enforcing pay discrimination laws had more information about employer pay disparities by sex, race, and ethnicity, and if employers undertook equal pay audits and made sure they were paying women and people of color fairly. This is why states have been pushing for pay data reporting, recognizing that when employers report pay data, it helps agencies more efficiently identify and target patterns of wage disparities and encourages employers to analyze their own pay and hiring practices and self-correct any wage gaps.

- CALIFORNIA: California passed a new bill that builds on the state's existing pay reporting requirement. The current law requires reporting the number of employees broken down by sex, race, ethnicity, within each job category and pay band. The new bill now requires employers to report the median and mean hourly rate for each combination of race, ethnicity and sex within each job category.<sup>17</sup> The employer must also submit a separate pay data report for employees hired through labor contractors.

- ILLINOIS: Illinois enacted legislation requiring private employers with more than 100 employees that are required to file EEO-1 reports under federal law to certify compliance with federal and state equal pay laws.<sup>18</sup> The Illinois Department of Labor will assign each covered employer a deadline by which it must initially apply for the certificate between March 2022 and March 2024, and each employer must recertify every two years thereafter. To obtain a certification, employers must submit the most recently filed EEO-1 and a list of all employees during the past calendar year to the Illinois Department of Labor. Employers must provide the total compensation of each employee broken down by gender, race, and ethnicity, as well as the county where each employee works, the start date of each employee, and any other pertinent information. The employer also must provide the following certifications: that the average compensation for its female and minority employees is not consistently below the average compensation for its male and non-minority employees; that the employer does not restrict employees of one sex to certain jobs or make retention and promotion decisions without regard to sex; what approach the employer takes in determining compensation and benefits; and that the employer corrects compensation and benefit disparities when identified. Employers who fail to obtain an equal pay certification or whose certification is revoked or suspended are subject to a $10,000 fine. Possession of an equal pay certification is not a defense against an equal pay violation, nor a basis for mitigation of damages.

- CALIFORNIA: California enacted legislation requiring California employers with 100 or more employees who are required to file EEO-1 reports under federal law to submit an annual pay data report to the California Department of Fair Employment and Housing outlining the compensation and hours worked of its employees, broken down by sex, race, ethnicity, and job category.<sup>19</sup> The first reports are due by March 31, 2021. The new law also authorizes the Department to publish aggregate reports based on the collected pay data.

an applicant's voluntarily provided wage history to support an offer higher than the initially offered wage, unless doing so would create an unlawful pay differential. The law additionally prevents employers from retaliating against or refusing to interview, hire, promote, or employ an individual for not providing their wage history.

- MARYLAND: Maryland amended its equal pay law to prohibit employers from seeking job applicants' salary history or relying on an applicant's salary history in considering the applicant for employment or in determining the applicant's wages.<sup>24</sup> Job applicants may still volunteer their salary history and an employer can rely on and seek to confirm an applicant's voluntarily provided salary history to support an offer higher than the wage the employer initially offered, unless doing so would create an unlawful pay differential. The law further prevents employers from retaliating against or refusing to hire an applicant for not providing their salary history.

- ALABAMA: Alabama was one of only two states without an equal pay law until it passed a law in 2019.<sup>25</sup> While Alabama has not yet banned employers from seeking and relying on salary history, Alabama's new equal pay law does prohibit an employer from refusing to interview, hire, promote, or employ a job applicant, or retaliate against an applicant because the applicant does not provide their salary history.
- COLORADO: Colorado amended its equal pay law to prohibit an employer from seeking job applicants' wage rate history, relying on their salary history to determine their pay, or discriminating or retaliating against an applicant for failing to disclose their salary history.<sup>26</sup>
- ILLINOIS: Illinois amended its equal pay law to prohibit employers from screening job applicants based on their current or prior wages, including benefits or other compensation, and from requesting or requiring applicants to disclose salary history as a condition of being interviewed, considered for employment, offered compensation, or being employed.<sup>27</sup> The law also prohibits employers from seeking a job applicant's salary history from a current or former employer. An employer does not, however, violate the equal pay law when a job applicant voluntarily discloses their current or prior salary history as long as the employer does not consider or rely on the applicant's disclosure when offering the job applicant employment, compensation, or in determining future wages, salary, benefits or other compensation.

- MAINE: Maine amended its antidiscrimination law to prohibit an employer from seeking a job applicant's compensation from the applicant or from their current or former employer unless an offer of employment that includes all the terms of compensation has been negotiated and made to the applicant.<sup>28</sup> The employer may then inquire about or confirm the applicant's compensation history.
- NEW JERSEY: New Jersey amended its antidiscrimination law to prohibit an employer from screening a job applicant based on the applicant's salary history or benefits, or from requiring the applicant's salary history satisfy minimum or maximum criteria. If an applicant voluntarily provides their salary history, the employer may verify their salary history and consider it in determining the applicant's pay.<sup>29</sup> An employer may also request that an applicant provide a written authorization to confirm their salary history after the employer makes a job offer that includes an explanation of the compensation package.
- NEW YORK: New York amended its equal pay law to prohibit an employer from relying on a job applicant's salary history to determine whether to offer them employment or to determine their pay.<sup>30</sup> The new law also prohibits an employer from seeking a job applicant's or current employee's salary history from the applicant or employee or from current or former employer as a condition of being interviewed, being offered employment, or being employed or promoted. Job applicants and current employees may still volunteer their salary history, but an employer may confirm their salary history only if at the time a job offer with compensation is made, the applicant or current employee responds by providing their salary history to support a salary higher than that offered by the employer.
- WASHINGTON: Washington amended its equal pay law to prohibit an employer from seeking a job applicant's salary history from the applicant or from their current or former employer or from requiring that an applicant's salary history meet certain criteria.<sup>31</sup> An employer may, however, confirm the applicant's salary history if the applicant has voluntarily disclosed it or if the employer has already negotiated and made an offer of employment with compensation to the applicant.

- COLORADO: Colorado’s antidiscrimination law previously protected certain employees from retaliation for discussing their pay, but it amended its equal pay law to also protect all employees from being discharged, disciplined, discriminated against, coerced, intimidated, threatened, or interfered with for inquiring about, disclosing, comparing, or discussing their pay.<sup>37</sup> The law also bans employers from prohibiting an employee from disclosing their pay as a condition of employment or from requiring an employee to sign a waiver or document that prohibits them from disclosing their pay.
- ILLINOIS: Illinois, which already protected employees from retaliation for discussing their pay, amended its law to also make it illegal for employers to require an employee to sign a contract or waiver that would prohibit the employee from disclosing or discussing their compensation.<sup>38</sup> The law does permit, however, an employer to prohibit HR employees, supervisors, or other employees whose job responsibilities require access to employee wage information from disclosing such information without prior written consent from the employee whose information is sought.
- NEBRASKA: Nebraska amended its equal pay law to prohibit an employer from discriminating against employees or job applicants who have inquired about, discussed, or disclosed information regarding employee compensation.<sup>39</sup> The law does not apply, however, to employees who have authorized access to information regarding other employees’ compensation as a part of their job functions and disclose such information to a person who does not otherwise have authorized access to such information, unless the disclosure is in response to a charge or complaint or in furtherance of an investigation, proceeding, hearing, or other action

Expanding Equal Pay Protections to Characteristics Other than Sex

Working people experience pay discrimination not only based on sex, but also on other characteristics, such as race, or disability. And some people experience intersectional discrimination based on, for example, their race and gender, or their disability and gender, combined. However, many state equal pay laws, like the federal Equal Pay Act, only address sex-based pay disparities. In the last couple of years, states seeking to strengthen their equal pay laws and close wage gaps have extended their laws to other characteristics protected by anti-discrimination laws so that employees have the tools to address the full array of pay discrimination.

- HAWAII: Hawaii amended its equal pay law to provide that an employer must not discriminate in pay between employees because of any protected category, including sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, or race in addition to sex.<sup>40</sup>
- MAINE: Maine amended its equal pay law to extend equal pay protections beyond sex to include race.<sup>41</sup>

2021

- RHODE ISLAND: Rhode Island extended equal pay protections to the following protected characteristics: race, color, religion, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, disability, age, or country of ancestral origin.<sup>42</sup>

2019

- ALABAMA: In 2019, Alabama enacted a state equal pay law, which requires employers to pay employees of different races or sexes equal pay for equal work.<sup>43</sup>
- COLORADO: Colorado amended its equal pay law to prohibit pay discrimination on the basis of sex, or “on the basis of sex in combination with another protected status” under Colorado’s antidiscrimination law, like race, age, or national origin.<sup>44</sup>
- NEW YORK: New York’s amended law extends equal pay protections beyond sex to employees and interns who belong to one or more of the protected classes under New York law, including age, race, creed, color, national origin, sexual orientation, gender identity and expression, military status, disability, predisposing genetic characteristics, familial status, marital status, and domestic violence victim status.<sup>45</sup>

Allowing Fairer Comparisons of Work

The federal Equal Pay Act and many state equal pay laws have long required equal pay for “equal work.” Numerous courts have narrowly and rigidly applied the “equal work” standard to throw out pay discrimination cases based on minute or irrelevant differences in the jobs being compared. In response, states are increasingly adopting “substantially similar” or “comparable work” standards that hold the possibility of broader and fairer comparisons reflecting the reality of the modern workplace.

2023

- HAWAII: Hawaii amended its equal pay law to require equal pay for “substantially similar work,” rather than “equal work.”<sup>46</sup>

2021

- CONNECTICUT: Connecticut changed its equal pay standard from equal pay for equal work to equal pay for “comparable work,” which is work that is comparable when “viewed as a composite of skill, effort, and responsibility” and performed under similar work conditions.<sup>47</sup>
- RHODE ISLAND: Rhode Island amended its equal pay standard to a “comparable work” standard, which is work that requires “substantially similar skill, effort, and responsibility” performed under similar conditions.<sup>48</sup>

- COLORADO: Colorado’s amended equal pay law provides that employers may not pay employees of one sex less than employees of a different sex for “substantially similar” work based on a composite of skill, effort, and responsibility, regardless of job title.<sup>49</sup>
- ILLINOIS: Illinois amended its equal pay law, which previously required equal pay for “substantially similar work...the performance of which requires equal skill, effort, and responsibility,” to require equal pay for “substantial similar work...the performance of which requires substantially similar skill, effort, and responsibility.”<sup>50</sup>
- NEW YORK: After its amendment, New York’s law expanded existing pay equity provisions to require equal pay not for “equal work,” but for “substantially similar” work, when viewed as a composite of skill, effort, and responsibility, and performed under substantially similar working conditions.<sup>51</sup>

Closing Loopholes in Employers’ Defenses

Current federal law and most state laws provide that a difference in pay will not be considered discriminatory where an employer can show that the differential is due to a seniority system, a merit system, a production system, or a “differential based on any factor other than sex.” Many courts, however, have interpreted this “factor other than sex” exception extremely broadly, creating legal loopholes in which employers can justify almost anything as a factor other than sex without much scrutiny from the courts, even if there is no good business reason to pay a man more than a woman based on this factor. This makes it extremely difficult for workers to challenge pay discrimination. Several states have taken steps to strengthen their laws by limiting employer defenses to claims of pay discrimination.

2021

- RHODE ISLAND: Rhode Island’s amended equal pay law specifies that an employer may show that pay differential is lawful by proving that is based on a seniority system; a merit system; a system that measures earnings by quality or quantity of production; geographic location; a reasonable shift differential; education, training, or experience, to the extent they are job-related and consistent with a business necessity; work related travel that is regular and a business necessity; or a bona fide factor other than the protected characteristic.<sup>52</sup> The law also requires that this defense is only available if the employer reasonably relied on the factor and the factor reasonably explains the pay differential. Furthermore, the law provides that an individual’s wage history is not a defense to an equal pay action.

- COLORADO: Colorado amended its equal pay law to provide that an employer’s defense to a pay differential must be based on a seniority system; a merit system; a system that measures earnings by quantity or quality of production; the geographic location where the work is performed; education, training, or experience to the extent that they are reasonably related to the work in question; or travel, if the travel is a regular and necessary condition of the work performed.<sup>53</sup> The law also requires that each factor be applied reasonably and account for the entire wage differential. Additionally, the law explicitly provides that an individual’s salary history is not a defense to a pay discrimination action.
- ILLINOIS: Illinois’ equal pay law was amended so that if an employer seeks to justify a pay differential based on “any other factor other than sex” or another protected characteristic it must not be based on or derived from a differential in compensation based on sex or another protected characteristic, and must be job-related with respect to the position, consistent with a business necessity, and account for the entire differential in pay.<sup>54</sup>

Increasing Available Relief for Victims of Pay Discrimination

Ensuring that equal pay laws provide for adequate damages or penalties is essential both to incentivize employers to lead the way in tackling the wage gap and to fully compensate victims of pay discrimination. Several states have taken steps in recent years to strengthen the amount and type of relief available to victims of pay discrimination and hold accountable employers who discriminate against their employees.

- COLORADO: Colorado amended its equal pay law to allow an employee who wins their equal pay claim to receive back pay for the entire time the violation continues for up to six years rather than three.<sup>55</sup>

2021

- RHODE ISLAND: Rhode Island amended its equal pay law to ensure that victims of pay discrimination can recover not only back pay and liquidated damages, but also compensatory damages as well as equitable relief, including job reinstatement, fringe benefits, seniority rights, and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs.<sup>56</sup> An employer that violates the wage history of wage range provisions of the amended law may be liable for compensatory damages or special damages not to exceed ten thousand dollars, appropriate equitable relief, and reasonable attorneys' fees and costs

2019

- ILLINOIS: Illinois amended its equal pay law to ensure victims of pay discrimination can recover not only back pay for the wages they should have been paid had they not been discriminated against, but also compensatory and punitive damages and injunctive relief.<sup>57</sup>
- MARYLAND: Maryland's amended equal pay law allows a court or the Labor Commissioner to require an employer to pay a civil penalty equal to 10% of the amount of damages owed by the employer if the employer is found to have violated Maryland's equal pay law two or more times within a 3-year period.<sup>58</sup> Each civil penalty will be paid to the General Fund of the State to offset the cost of enforcing the law.

- NEVADA: Nevada amended its equal pay law to provide the Nevada Equal Rights Commission (NERC) the authority to award victims of sex-based pay discrimination lost wages or other economic damages resulting from discrimination, including lost payment for overtime, shift differential, cost of living adjustments, merit increases or promotions, or other fringe benefits.<sup>59</sup> If the NERC finds that an employer with 50 or more employees committed willful pay discrimination, employers will have to pay civil penalties up to $5,000 for the first offense up to $10,000 for the second offense, and up to $15,000 for the third and subsequent offense. However, if the employer engages in corrective action within 30 days, the Commission will not impose the civil penalty.
- WYOMING: Wyoming increased penalties for employers that willfully engage in pay discrimination.<sup>60</sup> Upon conviction from a court, an employer will be punished not more than $500 or by imprisonment of not more than six months or both.

What's Next?

State lawmakers have increasingly focused on equal pay for good reason: it is a pocketbook issue that addresses problems keenly felt by women and the families who depend on their paychecks.

State advocates and legislators are leading the charge to ensure women are paid their fair share and are recognizing the power of transparency in closing the wage gap. More states passing pay transparency laws will help not only in closing wage gaps in those states but in shifting culture and accountability for employers throughout the country. At the same time, state advocates and legislators need to be alert to efforts to undermine equal pay laws like we saw in Mississippi in 2022. The fight for equal pay is not over—we must continue to press forward.
